Unhappy With Your Child Support or Visitation Order? You May Be a Candidate for Change!

If you believe court orders are set in stone, think again! If and when conditions change for one or both parents, child support and visitation orders may be altered.

Generally, courts will award an order for modification when an event constitutes a substantial change of circumstance, such as:

- Either parent changes jobs with an increase or decrease in income
- Either parent suffers disability
- Child support laws change
- The passage of a sufficient amount of time since the last order
- Needs of child change

In addition, the court may order a temporary revision in the event of:

- Child medical emergency
- Payer's temporary inability to pay due to job loss, illness, medical emergency
- Recipient's temporary economic or medical problem

In cases involving visitation, parents can agree without court approval. However, if either parent later violates the agreement (or "stipulated modification"), the other parent may not be able to enforce it. This is why it is a good idea to seek court approval.

Situations, which may be considered, would likely involve what is known as a "material change in circumstances". These may include:

- A geographic move by one of the parents
- A lifestyle change that threatens the child such as heavy drinking or illegal drug use.

Did You Know?

50 % of divorces are considered "good divorces" where the couples maintain friendly relationships.

Did You Know?

The top three reasons for post-divorce litigation are oversights in the agreement, remarriage and changes in income.
